

HALCYON

HALCYON

If there is anything Swarthmore students have in common, it is frustration; the inherent frustration of learning and of trying to succeed. The freshman enters suitably awed by the competition he faces, intellectually and socially, but with a secret confidence that his straight A's in high school really did mean something—that it will be the others, not he, who will get the B's and C's and unimaginable D's and E's. Very few confirm these hopes; fewer, if any, do so without struggle. All must find some encouragement to keep at it—a group, a cause, a person, a study. Protégés and children of praise enter a fiercely competitive society in which praise is rarely deserved, more rarely granted.

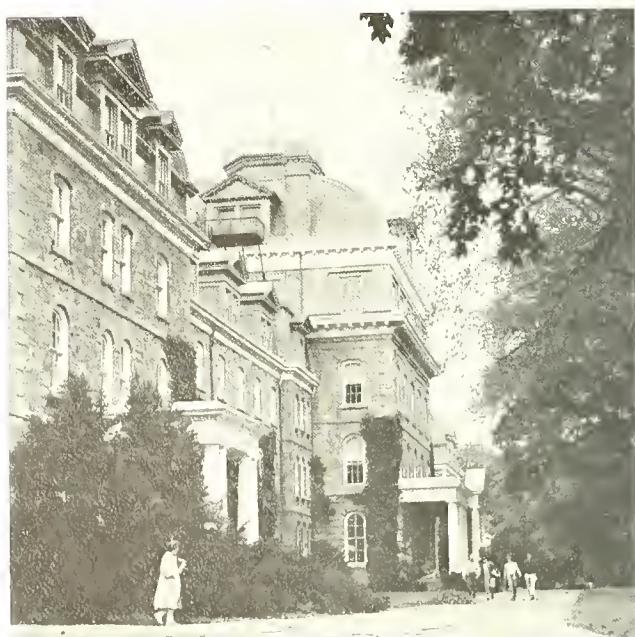

Will we, as one professor predicted, change radically in our years here only to slide back into our original opinion patterns? Will what we learn in books here prove inappropriate, useless, and, as James Michener warned us in Collection, nothing compared to the moral idealism we imbibe here? And will those physics exams really “all be the same in 100 years” . . . or even ten?

Each must find an answer to the new challenges and stresses, to the change in himself. The solutions are the diversity of Swarthmore, each contributing to the richness of the whole, to the impact on other students. So varied are the solutions that they cannot be characterized by one pattern of tastes or appearances.

A yearbook cannot depict the individual changes, the inner conflicts and inspirations hiding behind the peaceful grey walls that greet the visitor. Pictures can only show the variety of solutions—the moment of relief celebrated at a pep rally, the creativity shared in the student art shows, concerts, and plays, the political conscience splashed on the bulletin boards, the irrational reactions of a group striving for rational perfection. Something keeps people here in spite of their frustrations. The “something” is the subject of this book.

It is not enough to develop intellect, for intellect by itself is essentially amoral, capable of evil as well as of good. We must develop the character which makes intellect constructive, and the personality which makes it effective.

—President Courtney Smith, Inaugural address, 1953

The college calendar shows implicit agreement with the President's ideal. Swarthmoreans are NOT solely bookworms. Social, cultural, religious, and educational organizations occupy a considerable portion of our already crowded hours, and the "uncharted" activities of our daily existence do much to create the environment that we have come to identify as "college." Hot sticky buns and coffee in Somerville, spontaneous folk sings, long hours of bridge and talk in Commons, petitions, penny-pitching on Parrish steps, snow rolling, and the unforgettable Thursday morning Collection—these are as much a part of us as are the library and the dorm.

A pressure to join clubs and organizations "for the record" or to meet the necessary requisites of a Big-Man-On-Campus has diminished. Extra-curricular activities now derive their existence more from their function as a source of sheer fun, the much-needed break in a rigorous academic program, and from their value as an opportunity for the individual to experiment with and develop his own potentials, to discover more about himself and others and the possible relationships between them. Activities are an extension of individual interests and abilities; one gives by, and grows from, participation in groups. Organizing to accomplish what each could not achieve alone, all profit from concerts, lectures delivered by guest speakers, literary publications, social and community services, stands and action on national and international affairs, and a practical realization of the fruits of cooperative effort.

KAPPA SIGMA

Most people, including some of superior intellect, enjoy competition, enjoy being outdoors in the fall, and enjoy festivity. Apparently Swarthmoreans aren't like most people. —Clyde Prestowitz

Why should there be any festivity at all, even on the finest of fall afternoons, when our glorious teams go down to ignominious defeat?

—Larry Shepley

To play for fun is, I believe, the highest type of sportsmanship. The game is more enjoyable when we aren't tensed up over a win.

—Mike Meeropol

Admittedly sports don't provide an outlet for individualism like wearing a beard . . . but they do teach something fundamental and something unteachable in the classroom. They teach leadership, cooperation for a common end, persistence, and the will to win. We take great pride in our Rhodes scholars, Fullbright scholars, etc., but when it comes to athletics, we suddenly look down our intellectual noses and say "well we play for fun." I only ask: How much fun is there in losing?

—Clyde Prestowitz

The "win-win-win" philosophy expressed here is quite disgusting. It seems to me that the fact that we played the best we could, played together as a team (quite well at that), and even did better than expected is enough to make any Swarthmorean proud. We still learn teamwork, we improve our skills, and we still get the exercise, even when we lose. Even more important, we learn to be good sports while losing, which we wouldn't learn winning all the time.

—Mike Meeropol

Being outdoors is much too enjoyable on a nice day to waste in the midst of a shouting, pushing crowd, with the only view a group of agitated cheerleaders, some empty stands across the stadium, and a group of athletes on a once-green field.

—Larry Shepley

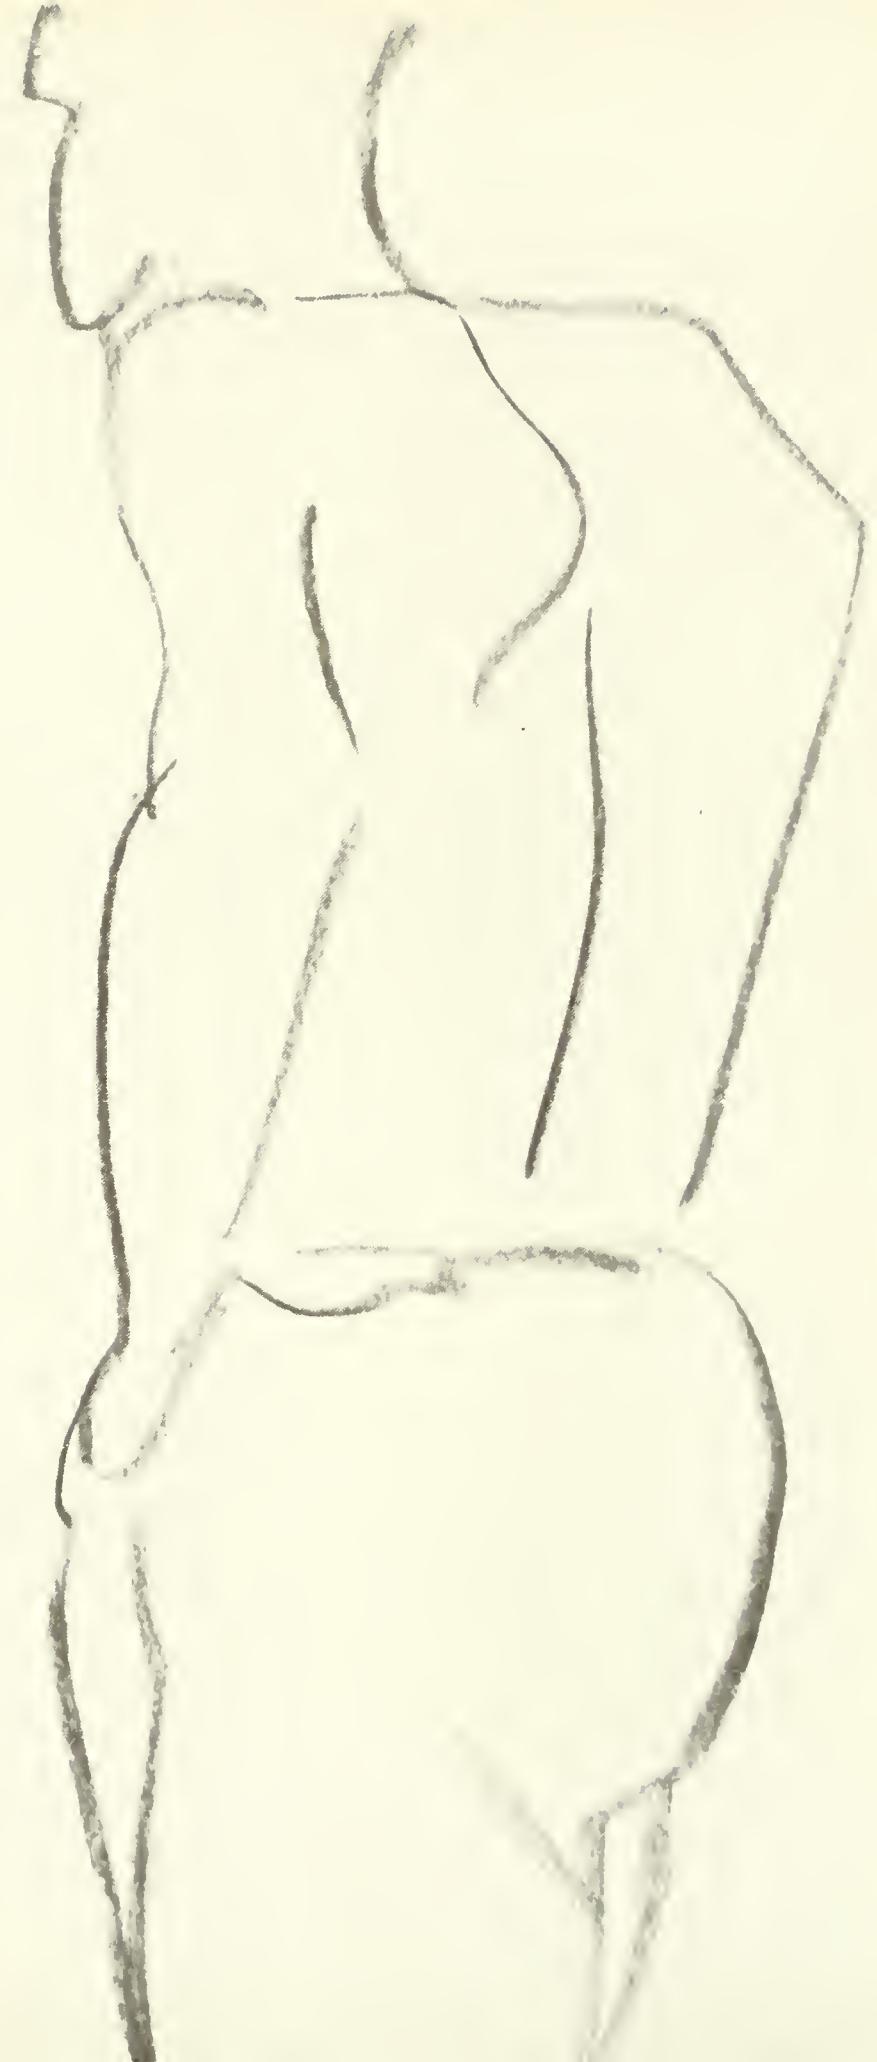

I can't help wondering if there is not something seriously wrong with a school when it cannot muster more than a few hundred at a football game on a crisp fall afternoon. Life may not have been too far off the beam when it pinned a bohemian label on Swarthmore.

—Clyde Prestowitz

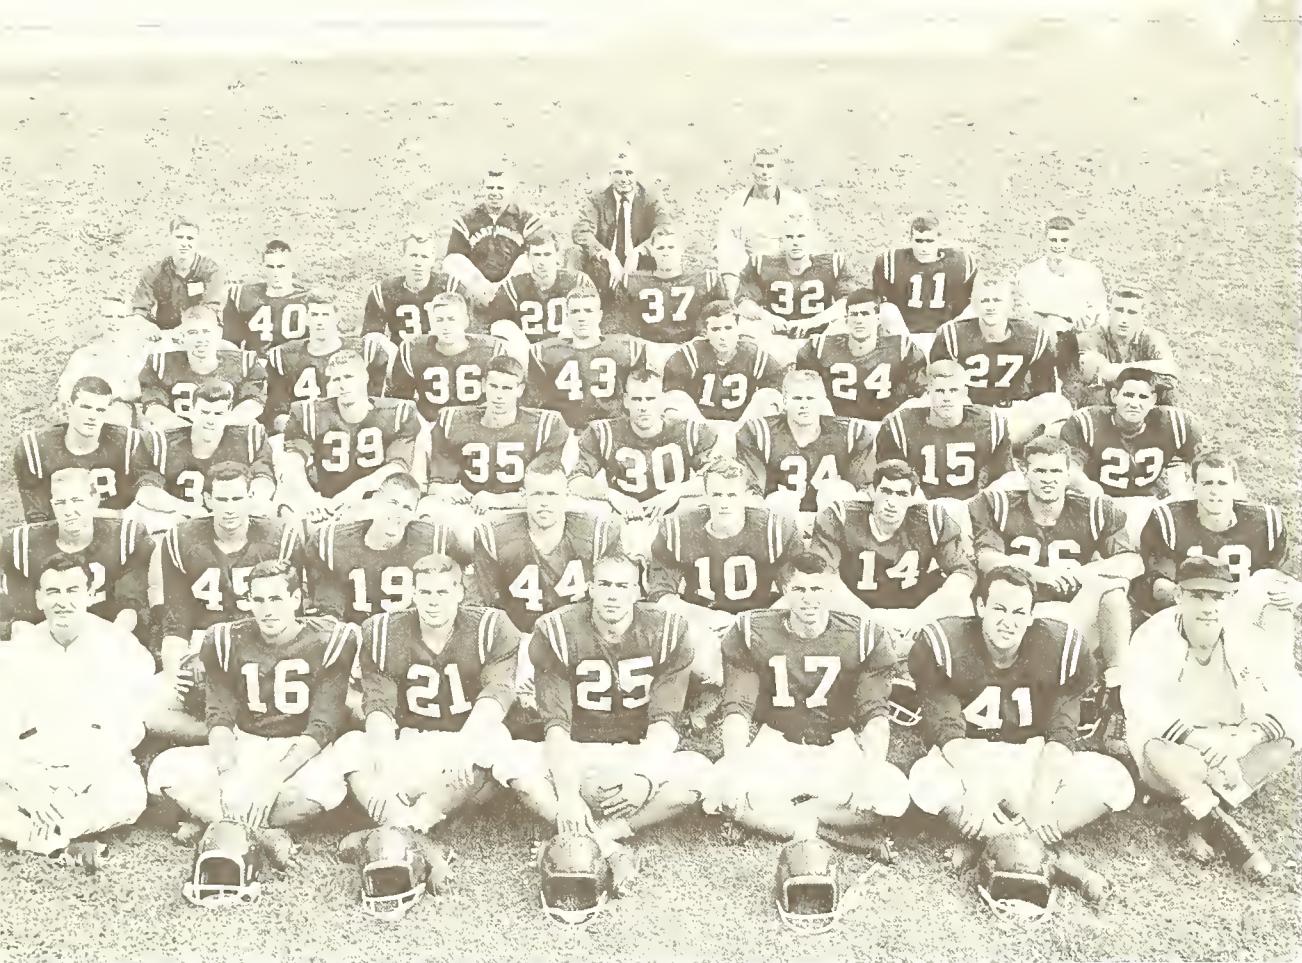

If so few people were present at the game, then they were obviously non-conformists conforming to their own non-conformity. I was horrified to see that you wished to increase this small group of people (who gave Life the impression of Bohemianism). I would suggest that if you were really interested in setting things straight, you might try your best to eliminate this small group before it grows and gets out of hand.

WAA

VIOLET DRAGONS

A dream of dragons come and gone
Awoke, unspringing the fresh time,
Turning the blocks, red balloons away
Laughing;
In the shadow loquacious pigeons
Murmering pigeons fancies
Ceased to move for a time;
You came upon them in stillness,
The shivers of their talk spreading
About your calves as you rested by the tree.

Your shadow cast two large hands
Each pigeon upon a finger
Balanced, uncertain that I watched
From an uncertain point
An uncertain distance away,
Then abruptly oblivious
Turning with the shadow-hands
Beyond, the tree a marker,
Their murmur renewed falling away
With the foot falls.

Miss Raycroft at Four

*Miss Raycroft was folded neatly on the sofa,
Her bun pinned securely,
Her feet crossed at the ankle,
Miss Raycroft sniffed her pale jasmine tea.*

*Miss Raycroft said no, she had never read Kafka (Never intended to;
After all, the Brownings . . .)
Her cup and saucer clattered quietly.*

*She regarded the leaves on fine white china.
Limoges cups, she noted
And took a final sandwich.
Miss Raycroft felt it was time to leave.*

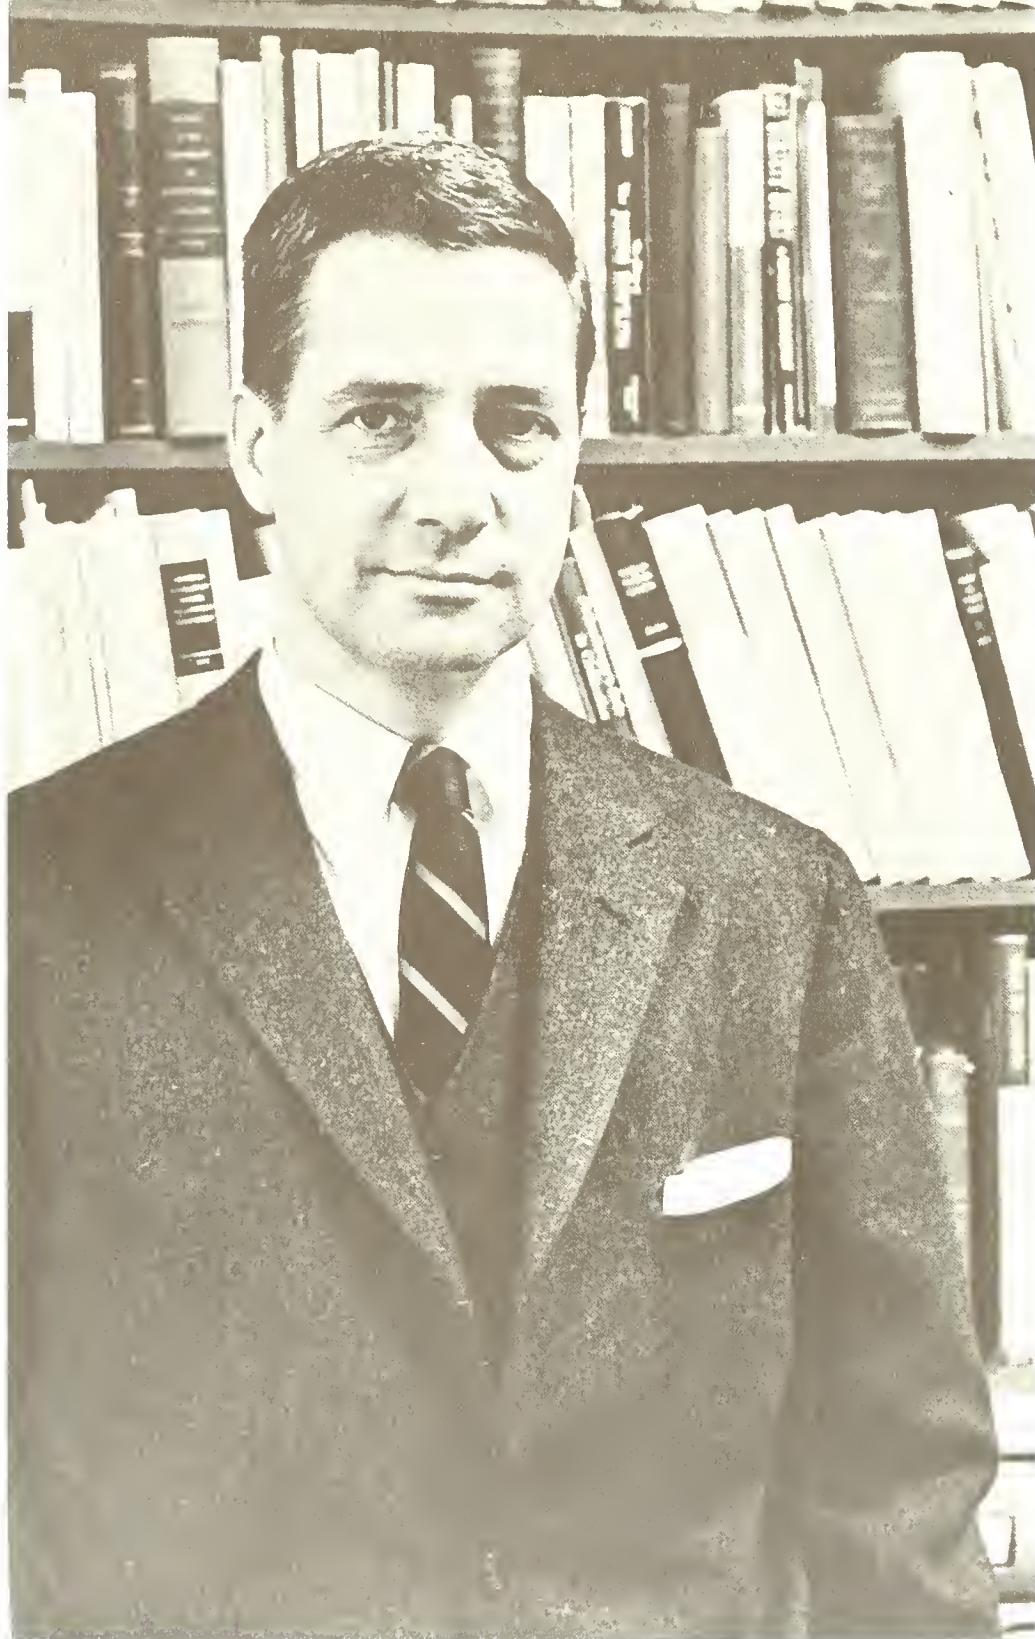

*Miss Raycroft buttoned her parchment-coloured gloves, and
Sticking in her hatpins,
Asked herself one question—why
Had she never really cared for the taste of tea?*

Swarthmore defies the single definition. The visitor's conclusion bears little resemblance to the student's experience. We ourselves disagree as to the college's attributes. Parrish may suggest a majestic southern mansion or a hideous monstrosity. The social life may be non-existent or it may be too demanding. The sports program may seem to lack sufficient status and spirit, or it may be deemed entirely superfluous. Who can say which is "right?" Swarthmore is to the individual, not to the mass.

One thing we do know, however—that it has been hectic! We wonder how we've survived it all. It's been Hell, it's been a nightmare, it's been aggravating, it's been frustrating. But it's also been Heaven, revelation, the peculiar joy of intellectual stimulation and intensity. At times we've loved it. At times we've hated it. Most of the time we weren't quite sure. One night we'd beam and slam our books on the table and shout, "Brother, Swarthmore, I've got you beat!" Next day we'd be saying, "O.K. Swarthmore, I give up" again. But somehow we've followed the crests and troughs for four years and in the end are glad for them both. If it had been easy—if we'd witnessed no struggle—we would have felt cheated.

But now it's over. What's next? Some of us know precisely, some have ideas, some still wonder. Once more, however, we can agree on something. There is much to be done. Our preparation to meet the demands of the world has been a well-grounded beginning. To fail to use and build on this framework is to deny our own potential and forget our mission. That which lies before us is everything. Next, for all, is the possibility of anything.

If you have built castles in the air, your work need not be lost; that is where they should be. Now put the foundations under them.

Illustration from new thread metrology booklet shows SPS technician checking a thread rolling die for lead deviation, one of the most common but least understood causes of thread assembly problems.

Three New SPS Screw Thread Metrology Laboratories help fastener users eliminate thread fit and gaging problems

Optical comparator. Standard equipment at each lab. Permits magnification of screw thread profiles from 10x to 100x on 14 in. viewing screen. Precision: .0001 in.

To help fastener users meet today's demand for increased product reliability SPS has set up three Screw Thread Metrology Laboratories at key points across the country. The identical facilities make available the advanced gaging techniques, precision measuring machines, and screw thread technology employed by SPS itself. These proving grounds of product reliability are located at:

Jenkintown, Pa.—Just north of Philadelphia, SPS headquarters plant, Highland Ave. Phone: Turner 4-7300

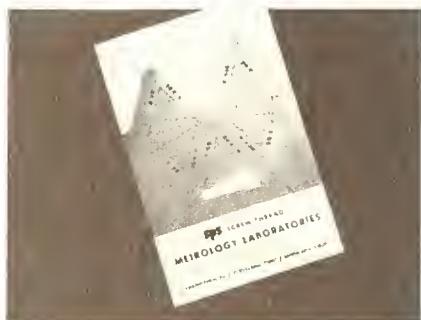

Cleveland, Ohio—At the plant of the Cleveland Cap Screw Co., an SPS Company, 4444 Lee Rd. Phone: Ludlow 1-3000

Santa Ana, Calif.—SPS Western, 2701 S. Harbor Blvd., Phone: KImberly 5-9311

Basic services of the new laboratories include analysis of thread fit problems; checking and setting of thread gages; setting up of sound thread inspection gaging systems; serving as a clearing house of information on threads and thread gaging.

Each unit—a showplace of modern measuring equipment—is air conditioned and humidity controlled. Each is completely equipped for thread-size control of Unified Screw Threads—Class 3A, 2A, 3B and 2B; and Tapered Threads—ANPT, NPTF types.

Fastener users are invited to put these laboratories to their service at any time. Simply contact an SPS salesman or distributor or the laboratory nearest you. And remember, whether you have an immediate fastener problem or not, a visit will be welcome. STANDARD PRESSED STEEL Co., Jenkintown 32, Pa.

Form 2369: "SPS Screw Thread Metrology Laboratories." 24 pages with numerous illustrations, plus useful tables summarizing unified thread dimensions and tolerances. Write for copies.
